

Dr. Richard Friend

University of York, United Kingdom

Richard Friend is an Associate Professor in Human Geography and Environment at the University of York (UK). With an academic background in social anthropology and development studies he joined the University of York in 2016 after a 20-year career as a practitioner in international development working at the interface of research, policy and practice in Thailand and the Mekong region. His work has covered a wide range of sustainable development challenges - addressing climate vulnerability and resilience, water resource governance, urbanisation and agrarian change. His recent research collaborations with Chiang Mai University have explored the social and environmental dynamics of emerging food systems in Thailand and developed tools and methods to assess systemic risk.
